way. But this is by no means the whole

But this is by no means the whole of the argument. It only goes to show the perfect democracy of the game. The winning of the pot is decided according to the mathematical superiority of some one hand among those that are backed in the competition. This is again typically American. Nothing but absolute superiority counts for a featherweight when it comes to a show down, and as the winner must demonstrate that superiority in order to get the pot, so the loser is compelled to accept the fact of defeat and acknowledge it as gracefully as he may after the demonstration. Certainly there is nothing in that which is "foreign to American ideas."

But the fact is that it is not true. Instead of draw poker being "based upon a lie," Mr. Morgan's criticism is based upon a totally erroneous notion of the underlying principles of the game. The bluff is certainly an important part of the play at certain crises, and the player who has not sufficient nerve to carry it out when it is forced upon him is not likely to be successful in his game, but he who assumes, for that reason, that it is the corner stone of draw poker, as Mr. Morgan does, misapprehends the whole science, and is doomed to certain deschere are all anorgan. This, of itself, is a sufficiently starg remark for a man who has never a known to indulge in physical vio-ce, and while it is hardly to be takrally, it certainly shows, if it ws anything, that Mr. Morgan feels ply on the subject. Either he has very exalted idea of our national tracter or a very low opinion of

But as for his opinion that it is not was eminent—even before he was out of his swaddling clothes—the clear thinkers and capable analysts of character had discovered and proclaimed the fact that draw poker was a game eminently characteristic of the American nation, and that a successful player must of necessity possess many of the qualifications which have made the American the foremost citizen of the world. It is o'erlate to think of shooting the man who labeled it American. He has slept in peace for many decades.

But Mr. Morgan does not stop with this. He goes on to say: "It is based upon a lie. The man who has the greatest capacity for deceit wins. Something like sixty years ago a man lay dying in a cabin in the backwoods of Indiana. His physician had promounced his doom and the victim knew there was no escaping it, though his allment was that insidious, deceptive disease, consumption, which sweeps myriads of victims into the grave at the very time when many believe they are on the high road to recovery.

"It's all right," said the pallid sufferer in his rasping, husky voice; "I'm close to the Divide, and nothing can stop me from crossing over, but you must keep things going for—say, door, how far off is election?"—weakly turning his haad and fixing his unnaturally bright eyes upon his attending.

there is nothing in that which is "foreign to American ideas." This, however, brings us to the final consideration of the "bluff," which is all that Mr. Morgan takes into consideration in his judgment of the game. It is true that the player who has an inferior hand may take the pot in one certain contingency. If he have confidence enough in what he holds to venture boldly upon it, he will be rewarded for his boldness in case—and only in case—the superior hand lacks the courage to remain in competition.
